

Trend Factor:

Every style is on a scale from minimalism to maximalism. Many in the 2020-2021 era under the umbrella of Workwear, Streetwear or "Tote warriors" are more on the minimalism end.

Any style of outfit is capable of achieving a pleasing aesthetic to its target audience, as long as the Articulation is on point.

Articulation:

First outfit:

1. The first outfit failed to emphasize the waistline. The shirt is not exaggeratingly oversized, to portray the contrast oversized shirts are meant to in order to retain her proportions.
2. Again, the proportions are off and the shades of color are questionable.
3. This outfit is a proportionally good outfit and it is a pretty common style amongst female hip hop dancers or dancers in general when they are not in uniforms. That is because their jobs require a lot of movement and sweating, which their garments are made for. Albeit it should be respected how one wants to portray themselves, a more masculine style does not translate to being underdressed. Women participating in men's fashion trends are also seen as fashionable. There are a lot of examples of this form of articulation being well received on the internet. This is because of community: where a group of people share an interest in the same niche.

Societal Role:

Clothes for men were used more as a practicality to show social class. Since the practicality of men's jobs we have not seen a big evolution in mens outfits since they have been practical to wear all along. Unlike women's clothing that need to be evolved to be more liberating to the woman's body. In this case mens fashion is extremely underdeveloped compared to women's fashion.

Henry Van De Velde, the dress reformist in the 1900s, started the artistic dress movement. He designed numerous dresses for his wife, and stood strong on his need for visual perfection. Never designed a single piece of clothing for himself. He had this to say: "That exception was justified by his belief that men's clothing was far more rational than women's clothing. This is so because "we men have less patience, and this trait of character has prevented tailors from exaggerating their inventions." Therefore since it was less often conceived as an instrument of seduction, men's dress was judged to be less subject to fashion and more of a result of the search for greater convenience and practicality. Indeed, whereas men's dress was "less dependent on merchants' opportunism," women were truly the victims of fashion."

The setting of his environment definitely contributes to his philosophy, where a male dominated society requires men to work more, and women are not obligated to do so, where they are seen more as an object of desire.

Now that fashion has become more democratic, and there has been an evolution in men's fashion, we have come to place more attention on men's fashion, and created more avenues to seek value and profit from men's fashion.

Internal Competition:

I agree with her standpoint that strictly fashion wise women are encouraged to put in more effort to present her identity, but to say that men inherently have a base of level of appeal is what I would disagree with. With a lower competition in men's fashion, it does not mean that men would have a base level of appeal. Fashion is motivated by profit, which means whoever sells more, becomes the winner. We cannot compare men and women fashion on the same level, because women have a way bigger purchasing power in fashion, as well as diversity. Men are exposed to clothing as a medium of self-expression significantly less than women are, because there are way more social norms to adhere to as a man, including the basic standards of a certain income, ownership of real-estate and transportation, ect. Therefore, it stands to reason the outfits might be less diverse. A man is not given the expectation to dress because his value is determined elsewhere by the society, whereas women traditionally are expected to focus more on her appearance. This is because women biologically have disadvantages to lower the standard in the fields men dominate, including pregnancy, period, athleticism, ect. The base level of appeal isn't based on gender, but what the society places values on. And this causes the following phenomenon. The example given here is a very common sight we see in our daily lives, where women would praise outfits of men they are interested in and downplaying each other, but it isn't a gendered phenomenon, you see the same with men calling each others npc (basic for when women say it), and downplaying feminine fashion styles(Which is related closely to fashion as a concept).

Fashion as a Concept:

Because Women's fashion underwent revolution to free restrictions, Women already have a wider range of already accepted styles while men don't. Men are less likely to accept to put themselves in a wider range of aesthetics because of the functionality and mobility, as most male dominated jobs require bodily motion and functionality in clothing, as well as most men not being open to the idea of androgyny. Fashioning your body is an expression of your identity and most straight men don't identify themselves as wanting to express androgyny. Simply because these men don't want to be misinterpreted for their sexual orientation. To overcome this binary thinking of staying within the gender norm, it all comes down to Representation.

Representation:

Media representation is certainly one of the biggest influencers on fashion. To me, what looks good on a person is very subjective, but most of it comes from representation. If the media promotes a certain aesthetic, people will be conditioned to accept and therefore like the aesthetic. There are limits to it but examples can be seen from the sexualization of different body parts, fashion trends and or celebrity representations. Especially the prominence of feminine men in recent years, like [names.....] we have been seeing more femboys because of media representation and people would start to understand the concept of feminine straight men, because of media representation.

How do we move forward:

Wisdom will be the one of the most prominent names in mens fashion. By setting a higher standard of a good outfit for a man, mens fashion would consequently catch up to the women's fashion scale. The democratizing fashion by bringing sub cultures into the world of fashion, providing less exclusivity and making the fashion world less hierarchical.

My Philosophy:

The philosophy behind the Taiyo Garment Shape and the starting point of all of these brands is this. Oversized Clothes. It is about the freedom that you have when having the clothes on, if I want to do something, I can do it. (So I can do the right thing). That's my ideal life philosophy. It is also a cover of a sort that makes people consider you as a person before how you are built, while not denying the importance of physical shape, it comes second to who you are. Also take notice of the inspiration and birth of this philosophy from these trends.

Take Inspiration from:

1. Korean Streetwear
2. Japanese streetwear
3. Skater culture
4. Ye inspired - Oversized Cropped fit

You will also see a minimalistic take on the design where I take from the philosophy of "less is more." You will also never see an avant garde piece from me. This is also drawn from the minimalistic approach but also from this sentiment - "To not do just because you can but because it has a meaning behind it, ei life isn't about happiness but about purpose."

You will also see the design direction from reference points, it tends to be asian aesthetic. The culture and philosophy of not being overly loud just because. To speak when one's words have purpose over the surface layer of the gratification of hearing your own voice. In this subtle way blending contrasts or polar opposites.

In this way I can share this/my philosophy around the world. To implant meaning into people's lives and give them a voice for good.

The design on the clothing should be able to fade into the whole outfit. This stems from an universal truth & philosophy of "The best way to win a war is to have the enemy not even know that it has been fought," and with the sentiment of "not fighting with the universe's rules, but using them to your benefit.
